Buggy problem has some Ross-Al students scratching heads

ROSSVILLE—Some students here are scratching their heads but not because they're perplexed about a math problem.

Some Rossville-Alvin Grade School students have been infected with head lice, causing some parents to keep their children at home to keep them from becoming infested.

About 30 students have been found with lice this year, said principal Mark Janesky.

The school has taken steps to eliminate the problem, including advising children not to share combs or hats and having students hang coats on the backs of desks rather than in the closet, he said.

Students who are found to have lice are sent home with a note that asks the student not return to school until the problem is treated, Janesky said. When students return to class, Janesky checks them again before they are readmitted.

Checks Monday morning found only one recurrence, Janesky said.

Lice are a problem not only for school officials but also for parents of children who have been affected, as suggested treatment includes washing all linens and may go so far as cleaning all carpeting in a home.

"It's a lot of work," Janesky said, "but the problem

RA studies company assessment

ROSSVILLE—The Rossville-Alvin school board is reviewing an assessment for a local company.

At a special meeting Thursday, the board reviewed assessment information for Creative Products. The information listed the value of the firm at about $650,000, said Superintendent Phil Smith.

This is the first time assessment data has been available to the school district because the company was

School officials question whether Creative Products, recently purchased by International Home Foods Inc., of New York, is worth more.

"The amount is set for this year but we're reviewing it for the future," Smith said.

Tom Galusky, Creative Products vice president and general manager, said the company would not comment
